Introduction

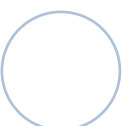

I am the beginning of ideas, since nearly the start of time. I am a simple object but what you use me for can often be quite frustrating. You can make me beautiful or a complete mess. I can help you solve problems and tell people you love them. I have some of the most valuable things in the world on me, but most people own me. You can use me to make anything.

What am I?

As post-graduate students of the health services management group, we are responsible for submitting a portfolio of evidence using our experience as registered professional nurses and what we observe regarding management skills within our workplace. During the compilation of this portfolio, we will be diving into aspects of staffing where it is required to draw up a human resource plan that includes personal and professional development skills.

We will also be fishing through the concept of change management recognising the need for change and making others in the working environment aware of the need for change. As the writing of this portfolio nears its end, we will tackle labor relation issues; and health service managers' involvement now more than ever due to social, economic, and political change.

In conclusion of this portfolio after reading through numerous articles and reflecting on each section, we will finally reflect on the compilation of this entire portfolio before we start the answer to the above riddle is paper.

1. Staffing

Draw a human resource plan that includes task analyses, job descriptions, personal and professional development plans, as well as a skills development plan.

1.1. Terms: Job Analysis, Job Evaluation, Job Description and Job Specification

- Job analysis

A job analysis is a process where we determine what are the requirements and skills for a specific. So, we will look at what are the requirements in terms of what will be the type of work performed and how the work will be performed.

- Job evaluation

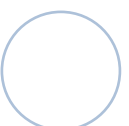

Is done to determine what will be the pay grade for a specific job by comparing it to different jobs. When a job evaluation is done, we will compare the responsibilities of and duties of this job to that of similar jobs within the industry.

- Job description

A job description is an outline of a person's responsibilities in this document we will outline their specific roles and duties. In this document, you would also find the conditions under which the person would work.

- Job specification

This is like job analysis but with job specification, it outlines the specific requirements the employee should possess for the job such as a certain skill or amount of experience.

1.2 Methods used in Job Evaluation.

According to Jooste (2017) job evaluation consists of four fundamental methods namely: ranking, job-grading, factor comparison and the point method. Let us explore these methods.

Ranking jobs: Jooste (2017) states in this method jobs are arranged according to the least to the most valued in the organization. According to the author, this is a very convenient method when only a few jobs require evaluation.

Job-grading: Jooste (2017) states that this is also referred to as job classification and is similar to the ranking method, except with grading jobs are placed into grades or classes. The author write that a decision is taken in advance on how many grades of pay will be created.

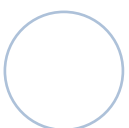

Factor comparison: According to Jooste (2017), this is a quantitative method that evaluates jobs on several compensable factors, jobs are compared against each other based on factors such as mental efforts, skills responsibility and working conditions.

Point method: Jooste (2017), states that the point method is the most commonly used method in job evaluation. According to the authors, this method is similar to the factor comparison method. The author state that the point method develops separate scales for each compensable factor in order to establish a hierarchy of jobs. Jooste (2017) write that the jobs at the top of the hierarchy get the highest wage rate.

1.3 Management responsibilities

- Planning

Vaishnavi (2017), states that planning is the primary function of management as it will ensure the optimal utilisation of human and financial resources. The author continues by writing that planning helps you anticipate the consequences of your decisions as well as allows you to identify possible flaws that might affect the organisation negatively. In the unit we as nurses base all our duties on planning by starting our day with delegation this is a type of planning where you distribute work amongst staff who will be doing work according to what and when it will be done. This planning also dictates what will be done first in order to reach a specific set of goals. There is a different type of planning such as operational planning, organisational planning and financial planning.

- Organising

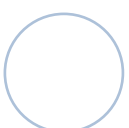

According to an article by Study.com (2012), organizing is the second function in management which help a manager execute and implement their plans through the appropriate assignment of workers in the team and the effective allocation or distribution of resources in the workplace. As nurses, we use the organizing function to allocate certain tasks to employees based on their worker's skills level of training and experience. It is important that the allocated tasks are understood, and the employees take responsibility for the task which will allow the organisation to be successful.

- Guidance

Francis (2014), defines guidance in an online article as an act or process of guiding or the one who serves as a model to others. Francis states that good manager will guide their employees and constantly encourage them to develop new skills to meet organizational goals. When we guide our subordinates, we as managers can identify areas where training and skills development are needed. When you offer guidance to your employees, they become more confident, and it improves your department's image as they are less likely to make mistakes and function much better in the team. Guiding and control should not be confused with each other as control has to do with dictation whereas guidance has to do with the discussion.

- Control

In order to maintain effective control, the manager should maintain adequate policies and procedures; communicate these policies and procedures well to employees and monitor compliance with policies and procedures according to Internal Audit Department (n.d.). As a nurse manager, the function of control is important to ensure that things that are supposed to be done are done. A good example of control would be monitoring record keeping as adequate record keeping ensures that assets are properly controlled, and duties are performed according to allocation when certain this is not done, we can then go to the allocated delegate and enquire why it was not performed. another example of control is keeping stocked locked up and having access control to assets only individuals who have authority has access to certain assets such as equipment or medication.

- Teaching responsibilities

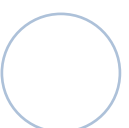

According to Fisher (n.d.), a good manager attracts candidates, develops, maximises talent and drives performance in order to increase their value and worth. A manager must work to increase employee engagement and productivity by being actively involved in their learning and development. We as managers must identify areas where there might be some type of uncertainty and strive to get the necessary resources such as training either in service or refresher training for staff as employees who find that information relevant normally adapt to new behaviours and skills.

- Personnel

The link between employees and management would be a personnel manager; the most important aspect of any organization would be the retention of human resources and here is where the personnel manager would play an important role according to VEDANTU (n.d.). VEDANTU states that there are four main functions of this manager which are planning of manpower, recruitment, selection and training and development. As nurses, we don't always seem to sit around the same fire the personnel manager plays an important role here as they act as counsellors and normally discuss issues experienced by employees as these managers have a good understanding of family, health and finances.

- Patients and family

The manager's responsibility regarding patients and family is to ensure that patients are adequately represented and that they are aware of all procedures that would be performed; they need to ensure that patients are receiving the best possible care regarding their treatment and the conditions where they receive this care is safe and hygienic. Regarding the family, the manager needs to ensure that communication about the patient's condition is timeously communicated to the family and that any adverse event or reaction is reported to the family as soon as possible.

- Research

It is important that managers do not make discissions based on unverified research. According to Team (2021), the manager's responsibility in research has to do with the collection of information and data to make sense of it. It is important that managers stay up to date on the latest developments in their field of practice by making use of verified sources. This information regarding new development in the field should be shared amongst peers to allow all members to stay up to date. It is also important to remember that information sharing should also be relevant to the level of expertise or experience as sharing of irrelevant information is a waste of time and resources.

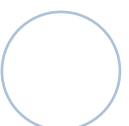

- Job specifications and requirements

Betterteam (n.d.) states that managers ensure that their departments are well-staffed and that these departments adhere to the quality and standards required by the organisation. Managers hire, train, and help develop employees. With regards to the job requirements, the individuals should have a strong understanding of business management further education would be required such as a degree or post-basic qualification. They should have good communication, interpersonal and leadership skills. The ability to analyse information and develop effective strategies and solutions. Regarding specifications, these individuals should be able to resolve conflicts and complaints. Be able to generate information and report to upper management on findings and solutions. Have a strong sense of delegating responsibility and supervising operations.

1.4 Self-Development-Reflect

When I had to start with this portfolio, I just copied all the questions to a word document and attempted to start answering the question from top to bottom which was a massive mistake, as it took me more than a day to actually start answering the questions. I feel that my approach was completely off this time as I normally would first start by thinking of headings and then populating my document with these headings. The start of the portfolio was really frustrating to me, as a result, lead to procrastination and a waste of valuable time I could have spent on doing other preparations. The only sense I can make out of this is the fact that I thought pasting the questions on a word document and just starting answering questions would make the assignment easier or I might save time which, it did not. My takeaway from this lesson is a better understanding of how jobs are created and how the system is used to generate compensation but, in the future, I will stick to what works for me ultimately and refrain from deviating from it. An action plan for me for the future is to not rush things or do things that might appear to be easier without thinking them through to stick to what works for me unless something comes along that debunks my way of doing things. Another valuable lesson I learned from this assignment is the fact that it is not always a bad idea to look at things from another perspective or based on others' suggestions as this will allow you to find ways to help others to find ways to better take on problems.

2. Change management

Demonstrate the change process by comparing various change models.

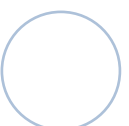

2.1 Principles of Managing Change

The world is changing, and change is happening faster than we think organizations must stay on the course of this change in order to thrive as those that can't keep up with the pace will struggle and fail in their efforts. A familiar concept to organizations is change management a fundamental model of change developed in the 1940s by Kurt Lewin and still in use today. His model is a three-step process of change known as Unfreeze- Change- Refreeze making use of an analogy of changing the shape of an ice block stated by Mind Tools (2019).

Mind Tools (2019) explains the analogy for a better understanding as they explain that if you have a solid piece of ice cube and your desire is to change the shape of the ice cube to a cone of ice, what do you do? You will first have to melt the ice to make it amenable to change (unfreeze). They explain further by saying; now that you have melted the ice you must mould it into the cone shape (change). The authors conclude by saying in order to maintain the shape you must solidify (refreeze) it.

By knowing these steps of change we can plan to implement the change required by creating the motivation to change (unfreeze). We then move through the process of change by promoting effective communication and empowering people to embrace new ways of working (change). The process ends when the organization returns to a sense of stability (refreeze) as it is necessary for creating confidence to bring inevitable change. (Mind Tools, 2019)

2.2 Manage Resistance to Change.

Managing resistance to change should first allow us to focus on the explanation of why change is necessary.

According to Hayashi (n.d.), we need to give employees an idea of what post-change would look like in the organisation; we need to include information such as how the employees and team members would benefit personally if the change happened. The author writes about the importance of affirmation when we do notice those change-resistant employees taking small steps toward a new direction, we must affirm their efforts.

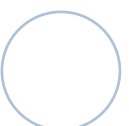

Hayashi (n.d.) states that we must respond calmly to mistakes, mistakes are going to happen and that is okay as failure and mistakes are a necessary part of learning and growth. We must provide constant feedback to these individuals and share progress.

Giving employees time to reflect on the positive emotions that accompanies fear or learning something new through encouraging emotional awareness. Hayashi (n.d.)

2.3 Preparing Staff for Change.

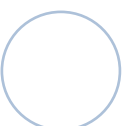

As the nursing service manager, I would make use of a model called the ADKAR model created by Prosci founder Jeff Hiatt. According to Sayenda (2020), the ADKAR model is an acronym that leads to an outcome that people have achieved for lasting change, awareness, desire, knowledge, ability, and reinforcement. The five elements of ADKAR according to Sayenda (2020):

1. Awareness of the need for change.
2. Desire to make the change happen.
3. Knowledge about how to change.
4. Ability to implement new skills and behaviours.
5. Reinforcement to retain the change once it has been

2.4 Change Reflection

People are oftentimes very fixed in their ways and stand firm grounds in what they believe to be right and wrong but we cannot blame them because if I grew up in a community where the collective belief is that a dam is a dangerous place for more than 19 years, I am sure that it is going to be extremely difficult to change that belief. I feel that only when it is absolutely necessary should we be persistent in our pursuit to change people's perceptions. Working with a diverse group of people from different schools of thought can be difficult at times as people are unable to differentiate between cultural beliefs and professional environments. My analysis of this situation would be that people take everything way too personally when they are delegated to do certain things, they would armor themselves with misery and chaos, and come hell or high water they really don't care they will make sure to burn down your house of cards and watch it in sweet anticipations as it tumbles to the ground. People inherently fear authority when a certain change is required to happen and it does not work through discussions, awareness and knowledge then we can use higher officials to dictate the change when all efforts fail and it works people normally do not question authority and comply easily. On the other hand, change can be very difficult to adapt to at times and it is always a great idea to give people enough time to fully understand why change is required this is because when people make the choice to adapt to change it will benefit operations more positively and the morale amongst the group is better. We cannot always make people do things that they do not want to do that is why I feel and believe that we need to let them get to the point of choosing to do the things or they need to come up with the ideas once they bring ideas forward we need to make sure we listen to them carefully and encourage them to come up with the solutions or methods to bring the change it is always a great idea to at this point to involve the team and ask for their feedback or how they feel about the suggestions made. When the idea comes from a peer it is also easier accepted amongst the group. An action plan for the future would be to encourage the team to take on the responsibility of identifying innovative ways to bring change to encourage them to take on the responsibility by guiding them and providing the necessary tools to achieve their perceived change required as this will promote by in from all peers and they will be able to keep each other accountable in the event where they deviate from the perceived change.

3. Labour relations

Analyse, and resolve a labour matter according to labour relations principles in a legal environment.

3.1 Employer vs Employees Rights

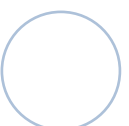

According to labourguide.co.za (n.d.), the employer has the right to expect employees to render the agreed services on the agreed days and times furthermore, to expect employees to perform under his authorisation; and to carry out all work instructions and obey all reasonable and lawful instructions issued. Also, to expect employees to display good behaviour in the workplace.

The rights of the employees as stated by the labourguide.co.za (n.d.), an employee has the right to make a complaint to a trade union representative, a trade union official, or a Labour inspector concerning any alleged failure or refusal by an employer to comply with this act which is the basic conditions of employment act. Furthermore, the guide states that an employee has the right to refuse to comply with an instruction that is contrary to this act or any sectoral determination. Additionally, the employee has a right not to be unfairly dismissed or discriminated against

3.2 Unfair Dismissal

Automatically unfair dismissal means an employer dismisses an employee because of his or her membership or affiliation to a trade union or involvement in trade union activities. According to OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT (n.d.), the employee refused or indicated an intention to refuse, to do any work is normally done by an employee who at the time was taking part in a strike that complies with the provisions of Chapter IV or was locked out, unless that work is necessary to prevent an actual danger to life, personal safety or health falls under automatically unfair dismissal.

Other unfair dismissals according to OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT (n.d.), is a dismissal that is not automatically unfair but is unfair if the employer fails to prove that the reason is related to the employee's conduct or capacity or based on the employer's operational requirements and that the dismissal was effected in accordance with a fair procedure.

3.3 Procedure Handling Dispute about Dismissals.

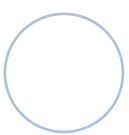

According to NEASA. (2021), the procedure for handling disputes and dismissals depends on the severity of the breach as it may result in a sanction that ranges from a verbal warning to dismissal. There are a number of types of dismissal procedures but we mainly use the progressive discipline style where we start with counseling of identified behaviour followed by a written warning if the behaviour persists on the other hand dismissals are usually only appropriate for repetitive or serious misconduct.

We all work in an environment where it is very easy for people to come into disagreements, feeling they are unheard, misinformation, or lack knowledge. It is the manager's responsibility to identify possible disputes and nip them quickly before it escalates into something out of control or an unsupervised confrontation. The manager should, first of all, listen to both parties in dispute, if possible, listen to the witnesses once all the information has been gathered the manager needs to bring both parties together and try to resolve the issue in the event that the issue cannot be resolved it will have to be put in writing and escalated to the next level of management.

3.4 Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration.

Journal (2019), states that in the case of arbitration the arbitrator takes his decision based on the facts, the arbitrator conducts the proceeding strictly by legal restriction and is expected to follow a neutral approach in resolving the dispute. Whereas in the case of mediation, the mediator has the freedom to select any suitable method of resolving the dispute as there are no strict guidelines to follow. While in the case of conciliation the conciliator is bound to follow the process given under the Arbitration and Conciliation Act (Sections 61 to 81).

Journal (2019), write about the cost related to the Process of Arbitration as compared to mediation and conciliation, which is a more costly and lengthy process. In the case of Arbitration, each party pays for its own expenses or Arbitrator. On the other hand, in the case of conciliation and mediation, the cost of the process and mediator and conciliator are equally divided among the parties.

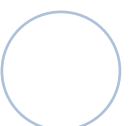

3.5 Trade Unions

One reason why people choose to join trade unions would be due to greater bargaining power, a sense of security due to various hazards and threats to income as well as the betterment of relationships by solving employee problems peacefully as stated by www.whatishumanresource.com (n.d.)

Reasons why people choose not to join trade unions according to www.quora.com (n.d), is based on a belief that unions damage society collectively, and that a conflict of interest exists within unions some people also believe that their vote in the union won't make enough impact.

3.6 Reflection

We can so easily talk and chatter in the tea room about how we are unfairly treated and discriminated against or oppressed and what we going to do to get those individuals back for treating us a specific way. When we do not agree with the way the unit is run or the way things are done, we don't speak up and let our voices be heard or give feedback or suggestion we rather prefer to talk about issues behind closed doors. We are often afraid that if we come up with suggestions or ideas they might be rejected and as human beings, we do not deal well with rejection. I feel and think that we are not really afraid of the person treating us in a certain way but we are not sure what are resources available to turn a hostile work environment into an environment that promotes growth and personal development. Discrimination and abuse within the workplace, especially amongst women, are very common. People come to work and leave work most of the time in a miserable state due to this underlying jealousy. In my experience, I have found that some colleagues won't think twice to stab each other in the back or throw the other under the bus for a like or a positive point the intention of the action is to place someone else in a bad light which does not come from a good place and this can transform into a very difficult environment to work in. I think we need to educate each other and share information freely to allow people to move to environments that might not be detrimental to their health pick up on cues such as passive-aggressive communication and stop ignoring it. Because as a manager if you place them on opposite shifts your entire work climate will change some people just cannot stand working with each other and this has nothing to do with the way they work but more with their character traits. An important lesson I am learning from this is that we will not be able to always catch a dispute early enough especially if we do not really know the type of characters we are working with or are unable to identify those small cues in people that tell tales that something is not going well. We need to get to know the staff we work with by checking in with them often to learn more about them and try to understand their characters as this will help us to identify those small tells. Another thing that I have also learned is that there are different types of managers and people are more inclined to go to certain managers than others we do need different management styles in order to achieve the company's objectives as diversity is the key to bringing the needed or required change.

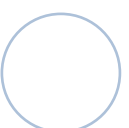

4. Conclusion

We will soon be faced with many challenges as managers in the development of personnel in a professional and personal capacity. Being inventors or innovators that will kickstart our organisation's transition to the next level of a forward-thinking phase; by applying the concept of change management to allow those around us, especially in the workplace to become more aware of the change required. As the next generation in management and leadership, we will be asking the questions of what and why backed by knowing the rights of the employer and well as the employee in the effective resolution of disputes.

5. Reflection

On the 29th of November 2022, around 13:00 I checked my emails and found an email from my lecturer stating that I need to resubmit my portfolio of evidence which I submitted a while ago already, and this is due to the fact that I did not meet the required mark to pass the portfolio of evidence. I am currently in clinical research and coordinating many activities at the same time such as leading meetings and writing participant's source files while staying up to date with sponsor protocols and work-related emails. This is a new opportunity I choose to take on to assist me in better planning and management. The role of coordinating activities is one with many moving parts and requires so much attention as mistakes is considered deviations which is not easily tolerated in the field of research as many things are at risk when we deviate from the prescribed protocols set up by the sponsor. When I saw the email today, I was really shocked as I had a very busy day with certain deadlines I had to meet. I feel very frustrated because first of all I really thought I did this portfolio the best I could. The problem with thinking I did my best set me up for failure because the thought made my mind at ease and I felt some type of release from the books to focus more on the work that I'm currently doing. I really thought I won't finish this assignment in time due to procrastination. As mentioned before I felt a sense of relief as the assignment was at its end as it placed tremendous stress on me which also spiked some insomnia. I have learned so much during the compilation of this as it allowed me to search on very relevant and common topics that we deal with on a daily basis. I am taking all the information and I am running with it. This assignment allowed me to critically analyse difficult topics and interesting information that I will surely be able to implement in my daily life. I have learned so much during this assignment as the information is easy to apply in our daily lives. Action plan to stick to what I know and not mindlessly jump onto things without doing a proper analysis.
