Dear Monwabisi,

Thank you for your response and for your insight, which I appreciate.

I want to acknowledge your advice regarding the timeline. I must also be open with you: yesterday, I was in a heightened state of stress, which I regret may have led me to communicate in a way that did not reflect my genuine intent. The news that this process could extend until January triggered a significant stress response, as my financial situation is urgent and my ability to support myself through the coming season is genuinely at risk.

Today, my emotions have stabilized, and I would like to formally retract the 48-hour timeframe I had attached to my request. I understand the need for due process and do not wish to impose an unreasonable deadline.

With that said, I did receive some relief today when finally the removal from the manager’s team was confirmed at 11 a.m. This has helped, though my underlying concern remains pressing.

I ask only that the matter continue to be treated with the seriousness and diligence it warrants, and I am grateful for your ongoing attention to it.

Thank you for your understanding and for your interaction.

Regards,

Wilbur
